

You work hard and you get to your goals and pursue what you want to do for your career. It's not just high school. This is life that you're setting yourself up for.

A degree is a degree. It's all in what you put into the program that you're going for. And just because it's the Community College, at the end of the day, when you get your associate's degree, you have your associate's degree. So community college is no, really no different than a four-year college.

Having the chance to get an education at a much smaller amount of the cost and then being able to transfer...in the end it's still the same degree.

It is definitely not a last resort. I think it's a great first choice option. You get the same education for a better price.

The stigma around community colleges is ridiculous. Whether you want to come here for a couple of gen eds and save lots and lots of money and then go to a bigger school, that's great.

I was one of those people. When I was like 18...that's why I went to the four-year school, you know what I mean, because I wanted the college experience, but I wish I would have come here.
